

The Future of Music

All over the world, every culture makes some kind of music. One thing for certain is that music is part of the human world and will always be part of our everyday lives. In the past, today, and in the future.

The Future of Music

Music can be really fun and simple, like a person tapping out a beat on a drum, or singing a nursery rhyme. Or, music can be much more complex, like hundreds of instruments playing together all at once.

The Future of Music

Some musicians will make up music as they perform. Others will sing a song or play a piece that someone else has created. People use their voice to sing or use instruments to make music.

The Future of Music

Music can take many forms. Traditional music from the past, made by everyday people, is called folk music. Classical music is more formal and was developed in Europe over hundreds of years. Orchestras and choirs will often perform classical styles of music.

The Future of Music

Popular music is enjoyed by large numbers of people and is more modern. People buy recordings of this music or listen to it on the radio. Popular music types are rock, country, hip-hop, jazz and the blues.

The Future of Music

The Future of Music

Musical recordings used to be listened to on vinyl records, and then tape decks and CDs. Now music has gone digital and we can listen to popular songs on many digital and social platforms.

The Future of Music

What will music look like in the future. What music do you like? How different will music be in ten years, or twenty years time? It is hard to predict but most likely, new music will be created with new technology. One thing for certain is that music will always be part of our lives.

The Future of Music